GEORGE COMBE MANN.

Classmates :

These pages contain the record of your accomplishments, during the past five years, so far as they have been communicated to me.

Death has taken from us Hoague, Holmes, Player, Spencer, and Van Rensselaer.

I thank you for your prompt answers to my inquiries, and trust that your interest in each other's welfare is unabated.

FRANCIS HENRY LINCOLN,
Class Secretary.

WILLIAM FRANKLIN DAVIS. Born 1840.

Evangelist.

Since 1880 has been engaged in Christian Home Missionary work; in the West, chiefly in the winters, and in the East in the summers.

He writes: "The city of Boston honored me January 13, 1886, with a fine of $81.35 for twice preaching the gospel freely on Boston Common, in the fifth month of the previous year, but Silas P. Cook carried off the honors by paying the fine."

His printed works are semi-annual reports of missionary tours and occasional religious tracts.

The following is an extract from his printed report, III, 1, 1886, relating to his controversy with the authorities, and which is inserted in this report, that his classmates may have the opportunity of knowing his statement of its result:

"On the afternoon of the thirteenth day of the first month of 1886 the Superior Municipal Court of Boston called the case of William F. Davis, convicted of twice preaching the gospel on Boston Common during the previous summer, without a permit from the Common Committee. The defendant stood up, was told that the Superior Court rejected his appeal, and he was fined ten dollars and costs for the first offence, and thirty dollars for the second. The 'costs' connected with the first fine were forty-one dollars and thirty-five cents. Therefore, the sum of both fines and costs was eighty-one dollars and thirty-five cents, and the defendant was ordered 'to stand committed until paid' Accordingly, he stood committed, and took a seat indicated by the sheriff, until that officer should be ready to conduct him to jail. But Pastor Silas P. Cook, of the Third Congregational Church in Chelsea, whose Christian friendship has been proved repeatedly since our acquaintance began in Harvard College twenty-two years ago, and whom I had hoped at this time, since he was an eye-witness of the judgment rendered, would be an authentic witness to my family, went to the sheriff and received from him a promise that he would tarry with his prisoner in the court room for an hour, within which time Pastor Cook promised to return with the specified eighty-one dollars and thirty-five cents, which he expected to be able to raise by the assistance of friends. In vain did the condemned missionary attempt to dissuade his old-time college chum and classmate from this purpose, arguing that the one whom the court had adjudged guilty should suffer. In vain did I urge that there was no knowing when the fine could be repaid; that the free public preaching of Christ's gospel to the needy masses was a cause in whose defence I was not ashamed to be cast into jail; that I had with open eyes disobeyed the city ordinance which forbids preaching, and would probably again improve the earliest opportunity to preach on Boston Common if set free.

"To all these and other dissuasions Brother Cook steadily opposed the necessity of his doing what his conscience required, and by half past five o'clock he had paid the fine. We left the court room together, and took the Chelsea cars for our respective homes."

Address: Mt. Washington, Chelsea, Mass.

* ISAAC THEODORE HOAGUE.

Born in Deerfield, N. H., December 14, 1844. Died in Boston, Mass., March 29, 1885.

When our classmate Hoague graduated, he had no very definite plans or aspirations beyond that general hope of getting on and making a living, which was common to all of us. He soon determined, however, to study the law. Few men were better adapted to succeed in that profession. Hoague had a good mind, great practical sense, and industrious habits. In order to provide means for his legal studies he became master, for a few months, of a private school at Walpole, in Massachusetts, finding "time to read some law almost daily." In the summer of 1868, he entered the Law School, and took his LL. B. in 1870.

In October, 1870, Hoague was called to the bar, and he afterwards spent a year in the office of George O. Shattuck, Esq., in Boston. In 1871 he set up for himself at No. 7 Pemberton Square, in that city. He at first shared an office with Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., now a justice of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, and with our classmate, E. J. Holmes. There was no partnership. The elder Holmes having left the office to enter into new business arrangements, Lowell, of our class, took the third desk in the office. Hoague's professional earnings at this time were very large, considering the short time he had been at the bar. His character and manners were such as to inspire implicit confidence. He continued to practise law for three years, with a constantly growing business.

From November, 1873, to May, 1874, he was in Florida, and in the cities of New York and Washington, on professional business growing out of public land grants to Florida railroads.

In June, 1874, Hoague married Miss Caroline E. Daniell, of Boston. In September of the same year, he went to Europe. He spent several months at the University of Berlin, and collected a library on the history of law and of political institutions. In this subject he became very much interested. After the usual round of travel in Europe, Mr. and Mrs. Hoague returned to Boston, in April, 1876, and Hoague again opened an office for the practice of law, in partnership with Holmes of our class. With the regular business of his office he combined a certain amount of literary work, writing a number of articles in the "American Law Review," the "Nation," and other periodicals. The summer of 1878 was marked by a very pleasant fishing excursion. With Brooks Adams, of the class of 1870, Hoague went to Canada, and was very agreeably entertained by Lord Dufferin, at the Citadel of Quebec. Hoague and Adams then went, at the Governor-General's invitation, to one of his rivers running into the Bay of Chaleur, and had great sport with the salmon.

Hoague having conducted, for the plaintiff, the case of Whitcomb v. The Phœnix Mutual Life Insurance Company, which was submitted on an agreed statement of facts. Judge Lowell, in his opinion, complimented Hoague on the ability and learning of his brief.

In April, 1879, Hoague accepted the post of instructor in the Constitutional and Political History of the United States, in Harvard College. He entered into the work of this position with great enthusiasm. It was in the line of his favorite studies, and he considered it the opening of a life devoted to speculative and historical learning. Such a life he was not long to enjoy. In less than two years from the beginning of his labors in Cambridge, his health failed him. A journey to Europe brought about no improvement. He returned home in 1882, and, after an interval of slightly better health, continued to grow worse. He died in Boston, on the 29th of March, 1885, of progressive general paralysis, resulting in suffusion of blood on the brain.

SAMUEL HOAR. Born 1845.

Lawyer in Boston.

Chairman of Selectmen of Concord, Mass., 1885 and 1886.

Travelled in England in the summer of 1883, and in Europe in the summer of 1886.

October 20, 1886, he was married to Helen Putnam Wadleigh, of Boston.

Address: 5 Pemberton Square, Boston.

*EDWARD JACKSON HOLMES.

Born in Boston, October 17, 1846. Died in Milton, Mass., July 18, 1884.

The following sketch is by our classmate Lowell: —

Our classmate, Edward Jackson Holmes, died suddenly in Milton, on the 18th of July, 1884, of heart disease. I think that such of you as did not see him in the last years of his life, can yet picture him to yourselves much as he was. He had carried with him, through years of sickness, the same bright eye, the same slight figure, the same lively and subtle mind which we can remember. Only the face had grown stronger and somewhat thinner, the mouth firmer, the intellect more reflective. For twelve years or more, he had continually been a sufferer; but pain and weakness could not make him listless nor indolent; and his ambition, although changed in its object, could hardly be said to have diminished. But if the qualities that belong to health had not gone from him, those which are often reserved as the result and consolation of suffering had been added to his character. Fortitude was clearly written on those strong lips. It was native to him, as was the humor which from childhood had made his conversation fascinating; while from what he had suffered he had learned greater gentleness and more thorough sympathy with others.

Immediately after graduating, Holmes began the study of the law, to which his mind was, I think, peculiarly adapted. He was especially delighted by the fine points and nice discriminations which abound in that science. He pursued his legal studies with the same ardor which, as we can remember, he had applied to his work in college, and was admitted to the bar in 1869. It was at this time that he received the appointment of private secretary to Charles Sumner, then Senator from Massachusetts and chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. Of that committee Holmes became clerk. He retained these positions during the sessions of Congress between December, 1869, and March, 1871; "during which time," he writes, "I saw a good many public men, and heard the discussion of a good many important questions, and got $7.20 per diem — 'miscuit utile dulci.'"

On returning to Boston, Holmes took up the practice of the law. His office was at 7 Pemberton Square, and was shared at first with his brother, now a judge of the Supreme Court, and with our classmate, I. T Hoague. There was, however, no partnership. After a time Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., left the office to enter into other business relations, and the writer of this notice moved his desk into the room. I can remember that Holmes and I looked on Hoague as a marvel of success, and for a beginner he undoubtedly had a great deal of business. I do not think that Holmes's practice was very large, even for a beginner; but such as it was, it was diligently looked after. He was elected a member of the Common Council of the city of Boston for 1872, and again for 1873, and a life of public and private usefulness seemed opening before him.

He had married on the 24th of October, 1871, Miss Henrietta G. Wigglesworth, of Boston, and they were living at No. 85 Marlborough Street, which was their home until 1877. But very soon after Holmes's return from Washington, ill health began to interfere with work. The climate of that city had implanted seeds of malaria in his system. In the summer of 1872 he went to Europe with his wife for a short trip. I can remember that an elaborate scheme had been laid out, and that the employment of every day, almost of every hour, had been planned.

In the earlier part of this journey he fell seriously ill with asthma. He had suffered from this malady in his childhood, but had seemed to have outgrown it; but from the time of his first trip to Europe, it was constantly wearing at his life. With great pluck, perhaps with less prudence, the projected journey was, at least partially, made. Holmes returned to Boston in the autumn a sick man, but immediately took up his work again. That work was performed with failing health, but with unfailing courage. As the winter went on there were many days when he could not leave his house or his bed. But whenever he was well enough to be out, often when he was not well enough to be out with impunity, he was busily working at his office. At last it became clear to him that the struggle was useless. Holmes gave in, and in July, 1877, sailed again for Europe.

Two years were spent in travel and observation, and with Holmes this meant more than with most men. It was at this time that he became interested in the science of archæology, for proficiency in which he was by nature eminently fitted. The archæologist needs a quick eye, a delicate taste, a shrewd head, and a peculiar faculty, not easily described or defined, by which after a good deal of training, style is recognized at a glance. These things Holmes possessed in a high degree, and to them he joined an unflagging enthusiasm. The two winters of this journey were spent in Italy and in Dresden, where the opportunities for artistic study are very great.

Holmes passed the two years following his return to America chiefly in Boston and its neighborhood, but by November, 1881, his asthma had increased so much that he was obliged to seek a milder climate, and the winter that followed was spent at Lakewood, in New Jersey. He had long given up all thoughts of resuming the practice of the law, and the one sensible course was to seek comparative health, where it might be found. On the 5th of July, 1882, he again sailed for Europe. A winter in Sicily appeared however to work wonders. Holmes was not a man to accept perpetual exile if it could be avoided. In the autumn of 1883 he returned to Boston and took rooms in Beacon Street, opposite the Athenæum.

I think that that last winter must have been a very happy one. No one that saw him then will soon forget the brightness of his manner, or the flash of his wit. He suffered less from asthma than for some years past, was surrounded by his books and collections, busy at his archæological work, and at another occupation into which he entered with great diligence. He was in the spring of 1884 for a second time a member of the Committee to examine the Boston Public Library, and on this occasion he was chairman and reporter of that committee. This is a position which is hard or easy, according to the amount of conscientious work which is put into it, and Holmes put in a great deal of conscientious work. His report, only eight pages long, is a masterpiece, and shows that in the few months allowed him he had learned a great deal about a very important and very complicated institution. There are a vigor of thought and a clearness of expression in the report which hold out the hope that the writer may yet do good service to his city or his country. There is neither weakness nor languor in this, his last work on earth. For the proofs of the report were but just corrected when the writer was called away. He went to bed in the evening of the 17th of July, not quite well, but without alarming symptoms. In the morning he was found lying still in the same position in which he had been left at night. Without a sound or a struggle, his life had ended.

* PRESTON PLAYER. Born in Nashville, Tenn., April 4, 1846. Died in Ocala, Florida, November 24, 1883.

Preston Player was born in Nashville, Tenn., on the 4th of April, 1846. His father, Thomson Player, was born at Columbia, S. C., and his mother, Emma Yeatman, at Nashville, Tenn. From the time of his birth until the death of his father, in 1854, Preston lived alternately in Louisiana and Tennessee. In the fall of 1857 he entered the State Military Academy of Alabama, and remained there a little more than a year. He then returned to Nashville, and remained there until it was captured by the Federal troops. Shortly after the capture of Nashville he went to St. Louis, Mo., and studied for a short time at the Washington University. In the fall of 1863 he entered Bethany College, West Virginia, and graduated there in 1865. In the fall of 1865, at the beginning of its Junior year, he became a member of the Class of 1867, at Harvard College.

It is easy to believe that he came to Cambridge with many misgivings. The war was just over. The imagination of a young man from the South could well conceive of rough handling and perhaps social ostracism by his classmates in the North. Player and Mealey came to Cambridge under these depressing conditions. We smile as we look back and wonder that they could have doubted us, and we count it a fortunate circumstance that they did not hesitate to try their fortunes with us. Who does not feel inspired by the companionship and influence of a nature so gentle and yet so manly as was Player's? Who does not feel that our lives would have been less full had we never known him?

After graduation he studied law, for a year, in the Harvard Law School, and subsequently in St. Louis, Mo., where he was admitted to the bar in December, 1869.

Of his professional life and character the Hon. George W. Lubke, Judge of the Circuit Court of St. Louis, speaks as follows: —

"My acquaintance with Mr. Player began in 1868, when he came into the law office of Mr. Henry Hitchcock, of this city, as a student. I had myself been a law student and clerk with Mr.

Hitchcock, and had been but recently admitted as a partner in his law practice, the firm being Hitchcock & Lubke. The St. Louis Law School, of which Mr. Hitchcock was the Dean, had also then just been opened. Mr. Player attended the school, assisted in our office work, and also finished his law studies with us. After his graduation at the law school he was retained as an assistant in our practice, his compensation being paid by Mr. Hitchcock, out of his share of the firm's earnings. In the spring of 1870, Mr. Hitchcock's health failed and he was compelled to quit professional work. In consequence of this our firm was dissolved, and I retained charge of its business and cases. Mr. Player remained with me as clerk. This continued until the following 1st of January (1871), when our partnership was formed, the firm being Lubke & Player. I had received offers of partnership from a number of older gentlemen, — men who had made good records, — but declined to consider these offers, for the reason that my esteem of Mr. Player had become such that I expected to form the partnership with him, if Mr. Hitchcock's ill health continued, and there was no prospect of his returning to the profession. There was only a few years' difference in the ages of Mr. Player and myself. Our association in the same office had also thrown us together socially, and we had become intimate and warm friends. His quiet deportment, politeness in intercourse with men, and sincerity made friends of all who came in contact with him. Our practice was confined almost exclusively to the civil courts, and we were favored with as much business as we could attend to. Mr. Hitchcock having recovered his health, returned to the profession in the latter part of 1872, and then the firm of Hitchcock, Lubke, & Player was formed, which continued until December 1, 1882, when Mr. Player retired from practice permanently, and I was elected to the position which I now hold.

"During the ten years of the existence of the last partnership, the cases intrusted to us were of the best in the civil courts here. In the years immediately following the panic of 1873, our courts were crowded, and Mr. Player and myself were almost constantly engaged in the trial of causes, excepting, of course, the summer vacation. Mr. Player ranked with the best of the practitioners of his age. His thorough knowledge of the principles of the law, honesty, and sincerity brought him a well-deserved success. Many of the causes which are credited to our firm in the Reports of the decisions of the Appellate Courts of the State were managed by Mr. Player alone, and he alone was entitled to credit for the triumph of the principles therein asserted.

"Mr. Player also maintained an irreproachable private life. His purity was exemplary as to conduct and language. His retirement from the practice of the profession was induced by failing health. He had an ambition to make an honorable professional record, and this inclined him towards the bench. Had he retained his health I have no doubt he would have been elevated to the position which I now hold, and I would have remained at the bar. A move to bring his name before the public as a candidate for the circuit bench was in progress, which he stopped by announcing the necessity of his withdrawing from the profession, for some time, at least, if not entirely."

In the winter of 1881, Player went to Florida, hoping to recover his health, and while there purchased two hundred and fifty acres of land near Ocala, Marion County. In the following fall (1882) he superintended the planting of an orange grove, and remained in this place several months acquainting himself with the details of the work. In October, 1883, he went to Florida with the intention of remaining there until the following summer, that he might give his personal attention to the cultivation of his place. By exposure and overwork, he contracted the fever peculiar to the climate. This greatly weakened his already overtaxed constitution, and was probably the cause of his death.

He died there on Saturday, November 24, 1883, and was buried in St. Louis on Sunday, December 2, in Bellefontain Cemetery.

At a meeting of the St. Louis bar, after his death, impressive remarks were made by Judge Lubke and others, and the following memorial was unanimously adopted: —

Whereas, death has again come into our midst and taken from us our beloved brother, Preston Player, cut down in the prime of life, and when there was so much to keep him here. He was young and full of laudable ambition. He was a modest, genial, and Christian gentleman, the soul of honor. He was a kind and devoted husband and father, an affectionate son and brother. As a lawyer, at the threshold of his career he took a high stand, and maintained it to the end. As a citizen, he was always ready to do and act his part in promoting the interests of good government and the welfare of society; therefore, be it

Resolved, by the members of the St. Louis bar: —

1. That in the death of our late brother, we have lost one of the brightest, truest, and most beloved of our bar. His death came as a profound surprise, and has filled us with feelings of unfeigned sorrow.

2. That we tender our heartfelt sympathy to his bereaved wife and children, his mother and brothers, who are now overwhelmed by this sad affliction.

3. That a copy of these resolutions be sent to his family by the secretary of this meeting.

Player was married September 7, 1876, to Susan P. Tiffany, of Worcester, Mass. They had two children: a son, Preston, born June 4, 1877; and a daughter, Hannah T., born June 24, 1879. The daughter died in 1884. His widow and son are living.

Player did not come often to our meetings, — the distance from Cambridge and the condition of his health prevented; but his grasp of the hand and cheerful countenance, whenever he met one of us, were evidence enough that he had a cordial welcome and a warm place in his heart for his classmates.

And so we are called to mourn the loss of another of our dear friends, — one of the brightest and best. A classmate whose talents claim our admiration, and whose character is worthy of our emulation.

"God calls our loved ones, but we lose not wholly
What He has given;
They live on earth, in thought and deed, as truly
As in His heaven."

*SCHUYLER VAN RENSSELAER. Born in New York, July 6, 1845. Died in New Brunswick, N. J., March 5, 1884.

The following sketch has been prepared for this report at the request of the Secretary: —

In July or August, 1877, he accepted a position as iron expert with the Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy Railroad Company. His work in this capacity consisted chiefly in advising the company with regard to the making of contracts for rails, in supervising their production at the mills, and in keeping a careful eye upon their durability after they had been placed in use. A large amount of travelling thus fell to his share; and though his business headquarters were in Chicago, so much of his time had to be spent in the iron-works of Pennsylvania that it seemed best to him not to remove his family to Chicago, but to retain his home in New Jersey and his office in New York. The five years during which he retained this position were, therefore, years of constant unrest and bodily strain, the work in the mills being very hard, and the journeys between his home and the places of his labor very long and frequent.

The summer of 1878 he passed with his family at Cresson Springs, Pennsylvania, near the Johnstown iron-works; and before it ended the seeds were laid of that disease which caused his death in 1884 — bronchitis. Year after year he struggled against its gradual advance, feeling secure in his sturdy constitution, and making so light of his ailments that his friends were unfortunately led to share his own optimistic outlook. Even during his worst attacks he refused to intermit labors which could hardly have been intermitted without loss of his position; and it was impossible to avoid dangerous exposure in a life which meant, summer and winter, days passed between the furnace fire and the open yard where the rails were subsequently examined, and often two nights in the week spent in sleeping-cars for the sake of a day or two at home. A prolonged stay in a warm climate was often urged upon him; but his family were dependent upon his exertions, and his love of his profession closed his eyes to the thought that, even if he remained in the North, he might better adopt a less laborious one.

In 1882 he gave up his position with the railroad, which no longer needed so much service as had been required during the preceding years, and turned his attention to mining matters. A journey to California and Utah, in the summer of this year, seemed almost entirely to have restored him to health. But another to Canada in the depth of the following winter undid much of the good it had done, and in the beginning of January, 1884, he was seized with a violent attack of capillary bronchitis, which resulted in his death, after an illness of two months' duration. They were months of perpetual and often of agonized suffering; yet throughout their course he preserved unimpaired his perfect patience, his cheerful sweetness of disposition, his courage, his incessant thoughtfulness for others, and his interest in what was going on in the outer world. Though for some weeks before his death he must have known that his days were almost certainly numbered, no word escaped him which might damp the hopes of his friends; — when he spoke of himself it was not of his illness, but of the work he meant to do when he should again be well. His life had been a strenuous and domestic one, devoted wholly to work and to his family; and his death was well in keeping with it.

Although he had many friends, only the members of the household can have appreciated him for all he was. His greatest force and charm lay in the serenity and unselfishness of his private character; and his greatest talent was the gift of commonsense — the power to judge quickly, wisely, and wholly without prejudice or fantasy, any practical question which might come up. So happy and contented a disposition, so tender and self-sacrificing a spirit, and so sure and well-balanced a judgment in the ordinary affairs of life as he possessed could only be understood in his home; and his richest influence was felt by those whose lives were most closely bound up with his own.

One of his most remarkable qualities, however, considering his birth and nurture and personal tastes, was the intense sympathy he felt with the working classes. Labor, not as a means towards the mere making of money, but in itself, he esteemed in a characteristically American way; and his respect for working men in general was extended to individuals, and was quickly felt by all of humbler birth with whom he came in contact. Without laying aside the manners of action or speech proper to his own class, he invariably took an attitude of genuine friendliness towards the artisans and mechanics among whom his life was so largely spent. When acting as inspector for the railroad company he was, in a sense, the "natural enemy" of the men whose work he watched; yet, although he was the strictest and most exacting of inspectors, and although many who were less exacting were regarded as enemies, he was always held as a friend. His constant effort to lighten the workmen's labors and to accommodate his own convenience to theirs brought him cheerful and conscientious service in return; and his evident fellow feeling for them as men of like nature with himself caused him to be as much beloved in his private as respected in his professional capacity. These facts seem worth noting at this moment, for if men of his station more commonly shared his brotherly attitude towards those of lower station, the great problem of our day would be much more hopefully near solution.

The bent of his mind was primarily scientific, practical; but he had a keen feeling for literature and for music, and an infinite respect for those forms of art with which he had never had time or occasion to familiarize himself. A collegiate education seemed to him the only worthy basis for any form of later activity, however unscholastic. The circumstances of his life were such that he saw very little of his classmates after graduation and could only once return to Cambridge. But his friends were individually remembered with warm affection; he always spoke of college years as the happiest of a man's life and the most fertile in after good results; and though she has had more active servers than he was able to be, his Alma Mater has had no more loving, loyal, and grateful son.

CHARLES DAVID WADSWORTH. Born 1847.

Banker and stock-broker in New York since January 1, 1884, of the firm of Wadsworth & Barker.

Was Councilman for the city of Plainfield, N. J., in 1884 and 1885.

June 18, 1882, a son, William, was born.

Address: 44 New Street, New York.

ELWYN WALLER. Born 1846.

Professor of Analytical Chemistry in the School of Mines, Columbia College, 1885, but is temporarily at Ashville, N. C.

Expert for the New York Dairy Commission, in enforcing the law against the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, 1882–1885. Resigned his position of chemist to the New York Health Department, March, 1885.

In addition to societies previously reported, is a member of the Society of Chemical Industry, England: American Society of Mining Engineers; University Club of New York; Harvard Club of New York; Ashville Club; Ashville Amateur Photographic Club. American correspondent for the London "Analyst," a monthly periodical, devoted principally to research in the line of food investigations.

Since the last report he has published "Modulus of Hydrometers," in the "Quarterly Journal of the School of Mines," New York: "Report on Butter and its Substitutes," to the New York Dairy Commissioners, 1886: "Notes on Water Supplies," and "Butter Analysis," in the "Journal of the American Chemical Society," June, 1886; and other papers relating to his specialties.

August 3, 1882, a daughter, Anna Trumbull, was born.

January 6, 1887, his wife died.

In November, 1885, his wife and children went to Ashville, N. C. His wife was afflicted with consumption, and Waller made as frequent trips to Ashville as his college duties would allow. In the hope of prolonging his wife's life, and possibly effecting a cure, he bought a place there, in 1886, on the hill overlooking the city — an odd place — with a house on it partly constructed of logs, and roofed with barrel staves. Its oddity and the fine air and view were attractive to them, but his wife's disease progressed steadily, and she died as stated above. Waller and his children remain there at present, expecting to return North this summer. He occupies himself with carpentering and improving his place. He expects to resume his college duties next fall.

NON-GRADUATES.

The Secretary has information of the following: —

FREDERIC AMORY.

Treasurer of the Nashua Manufacturing Company and of the Jackson Company.

Director of the State National Bank, of Boston, since 1880.

Address: 40 Water Street, Boston.

JOSEPH BALCH BRAMAN.

Lawyer, notary-public, passport agent, commissioner of the United States Court of Claims, commissioner of deeds for all the States, Territories, District of Columbia, British Provinces, India, Australia, etc., in New York.

Moved from Boston to New York in 1883, and in that year was admitted to the bar in New York City, the Supreme Court of the State of New York, the United States Circuit and District Courts for the Southern District of New York.

He writes: "In 1883 I left Boston because I thought a competency could be more quickly obtained in New York City. I have more commissions and appointments than any one in the world. I rely much on advertising, and find it very useful. Boston is a pleasant place for a residence, and one enjoys much there which he cannot elsewhere. New York is a great place for business if one can catch on, and I am becoming well established here."

Address: 120 Broadway, New York.

*EDWARD LAW.
Died in Philadelphia, October 5, 1881.

THOMAS CLARKSON PARRISH.
Artist in Colorado Springs, Colorado.
In December, 1883, he went to Paris, studying there until May, 1884, when he hired a cottage at Veulettes, a small fishing village, in Normandy. Lived there, drawing and painting, until August, 1884, when he went to Belgium for a short time. Spent September of that year in sketching in Norway along the coast, as far north as Hammerfest, returning by way of Stockholm, Copenhagen, and Berlin, stopping a few days in each place. Returned to America in October, 1884.
He first exhibited in the New York Water Color Exhibition in the spring of 1886, and exhibited four original etchings in the spring exhibition of the New York Etching Club, in 1887. Fredenia, Keppel, & Co. bought and published his first offered plate in December, 1886, and at about the same time he published three more plates etched from original sketches in Norway and in Washington, D. C.

He has adopted copper-plate etching as the special branch he will follow.

November, 1883, his wife died.

He died December 24, 1883. The Secretary has the following particulars of his life subsequent to his leaving the class: —

On leaving Harvard College he entered the Sophomore class at Amherst, and was graduated in 1867. He then entered the wool and dry-goods commission house of Converse, Blagden, & Co., where he passed two years, leaving in 1869 to take a position with the National Tube Works Company at their mills at East Boston. It was intended that he should learn the business practically, and his duties at East Boston were what is called "time-keeping," in particular, and many other duties of an important character connected with the manufacturing department.

In 1872, the National Tube Works Company built new mills at McKeesport, Pa. Converse was sent there in August, 1872, to assume the same line of duties as he had been performing at the old works at East Boston. As the business increased, his thorough knowledge of the details of the manufacturing operations, and the necessity for such a man in the more responsible departments, caused his rapid advancement. He was appointed as Chief Correspondent, which position he filled for about two years. He was then promoted to the responsible office of Purchasing Agent, which he held until the time of his death. He was Assistant Manager of all departments pertaining to the manufacturing of goods as well.

When large rolling mills were added to the company's plant, they were placed under his charge. He purchased millions of dollars' worth of supplies during his occupancy of the position of Purchasing Agent, and had the reputation of being a keen, sharp buyer, one whose face was no indication of his feelings. He was punctilious in all business matters, scrupulously honest in purpose, and in every detail of his transactions. He was sincere and in earnest in every phase of social and business life. He was extremely popular and much liked and respected by the workmen.

In 1880 the strain upon his mental and physical powers, caused by the conscientious fulfilment of all the duties of his position, were so great as to demand partial rest, and in the spring of three consecutive years he went to Europe. These trips abroad were full of useful and instructive study, and there are but few of the celebrated iron and steel works in Europe that were not visited by him.

In the fall of 1883 his physicians recommended an immediate change of air, and he went to Texas, successfully attending to numerous business matters in that State previous to his departure for San Francisco to adjust some business matters there. Although feeling ill at the time of leaving home, his last letters reported a complete restoration of health and the return of his customary cheerfulness.

He died December 24, 1883, in the cars near Los Angeles, Cal., from heart disease, his death being painless and instantaneous. He was born February 17, 1846. His funeral took place from his family residence at Hazlewood, Pittsburg, Pa., January 3, 1884.

He was married to Louise K. Dunshee, of McKeesport, Pa., who, with a son, James C., born September 9, 1875, survived him.

CLASS OF 1867 SCHOLARSHIP.

The Secretary received a letter from our classmate, Samuel Hoar, dated June 1, 1886, from which the following is an extract: —

"I acted for the executor of the will of Robert Treat Paine, late of Brookline, and whatever fee I received would diminish the amount to be ultimately paid to the College under the will. I was paid two thousand dollars, and concluded to dispose of it as will appear from the following extract from a communication which I have to-day sent to President Eliot: —

"I give to the President and Fellows of Harvard College the sum of two thousand dollars, to be by them invested and the income thereof annually added to the principal, until the principal shall be thereby increased to twenty-five hundred dollars; and thereafter the net income shall be annually paid at or near the beginning of the second half of each College year, to some member of the Freshman Class, in the Academic Department of Harvard College, who shall seem to the said President and Fellows meritorious and in need of assistance.

"Said fund and the accumulation and income shall be known as the Class of 1867 Scholarship, and in the distribution of the income thereof, children or grandchildren of members of the Class of 1867 of Harvard College, who are deemed worthy, shall be preferred.

"One classmate has already notified me that he should like to subscribe fifty dollars, and I think perhaps that others of the class might be interested to raise say five hundred or one thousand dollars.

"I should like very much to have the fund amount to at least three thousand dollars when we are twenty-five years out of College, at which time I suppose my part of it will amount to twenty-five hundred dollars."

This was communicated to the members of the class, and additional subscriptions were asked for.

On February 11, 1887, the sum of $503.36, contributed by members of the class, was paid to the Treasurer of Harvard College and added to this fund, since which payment the conditions originally imposed have been modified, so that it is understood to be immediately available for "children or grandchildren of members of the Class of 1867," but to accumulate by the addition of interest during those years when no such beneficiary is in the College, until it shall amount to $3,000, or such an amount as shall enable it to yield an annual income of $150.

The further sum of $12.50 is in the hands of the Secretary to be added to this fund, but paid since the above amount was sent to the Treasurer of the College.
